his landlord; he frequently pays down a sum equal to ten years' (it used to be twenty years') rental before he can enter. If the money be his own, the payment cleans him out, and he has nothing, or too little, left for suitable stock and implements. If he has to borrow the money, the debt is a milistone round his neck for years. In many cases in Ulster that tenant is compelled to pay the (naurious) interest of the money he has thus borrowed by giving up to the londer one, or two of the best fields on his bolding, and he feels the drain most bitterly. Now, an impoverished he and unthriving farmer will seldom be a connd tented one, even if the farm be his own in to. fee-simple; nay, more, he will not long retain

It cannot, without ont the meat rigilant and artificial sufequerels. d be made even to produce the effect at which it ere tims, namely, the creation of a class of persunt re proprietors. Year by year these small properties would come back into the market; the original purchasers, who had crippled or ruined themselves by the purchase, would become bankeupt and he forced to sell, and the plats funless forcible regulations were silepted to hat present the operation) would constantly be bought up by capitalists who would uposolidate aly them, knowing well that only thus, in a climate er like that of Ireland, can the soil be profitably worked. Some would sell from necessity: others would sell because tempted by high will before. A class of art ficially created peasant proprietors is nearly always a poor class; and enligators of the soil, if poor, invariably fall into the hands of mortisagees, or are bought out by wealthier and larger handholders. It is well known that meanly all the peagant properties in. nted France are so deeply mortgaged, and often at so on; high a rate of interest, that the nomin if proprietor is virtually no better than owner on sufferance, and is habitually pinched and imporevished in the extreme. keep the most important of them out of sight On close investigation it will be found, that wherever peasant proprietors are prosperous refer. and tolerably comfortable, either the population. is artificially and resolutely prevented from increasing, or emigration relieves the land of all merplus or multiplying numbers, or there. are floorishing manufactures close at hand toafford a supplementary livelihood to the strugling cultivators of the suil, or the properties are by no means small. Now Ireland has scarcely any manufactures, the tendency to subdivision is extreme, and her people are incurably prolificate But the most conclusive objection to the . an- scheme-pussing by several minor ones, such as Inter- the almost insuperable obstacles it would pre-ation, sent to the larger and most needed improve-Sected. menta like arterial drainage must be found in ens of the facilities it would afford and the enconvergement it would give to that bubit of subletting and subdivision which brought the country to Il the such a fearful condition previous to the famine. Supposing that the catates were originally sold in properties verying from fifteen to thirty on of scree, according to the quality of the landor dif these being by universal admission the smallest thich farms that can be cultivated so as to do justice this to the land and afford a decent maintenance to stence the family—then (unless the link nature has veory, hern radically changed, of which we can see no hadication) the old permissions process would at office begin. The peasont proprietor, being absolute owner, could not be prevented from We doing what he would with his own; and what be is certain to will is either to sell off lumes, at a profit, or to sublet, at a profit rent as much of the property as will still leave bim a few fields for a precurious, but what he deems an adequate, subsistence. The Irish peasant who has twenty, thirty, or fifty, acres of his own, will never dream of allowing his ere and some to emigrate, or of vefasing them leave to meet marry, when he can divide his holding with them; and in a single generation the property ment at which was calculated to be just sufficient to. one decent family will be supporting three or four, and in a second generation seven or eight, in squalid wretcheduces. It always had been la that so. No one attempts to deny the historical and y now that it will not be so in future lies with these who are now enamoured of this desperate propued ones which, so far us we know, not one of them has ventured to assume. Subdivision of the land has for generations been the great curse of Ireland. Mr. Bright and his
